Amongst the most gallant of the Italian leaders was Pompaxlius Silo, a Marsian. Such was his familiarity with Livius Drusus that he had been received as an inmate of the Tribunes household. One day Silo came in with some friends to a room where the two nephews of his host, boys of from four to six years old, were sitting or playing together alone. Instead of joining in their game or entering into their prattle with each other, the Marsian, fresh, perhaps, from some conference in which his leader had very likely disappointed him, appealed to the boys, more solemnly than sportively: -- Say, now, that ye will entreat your uncle to have us made free citizens! The elder smiled and nodded assent. But the younger kept his peace, though asked a second time. Pompadius then took him up as if to throw him from the window. But the child would make no promise of the assistance which the Italian pretended to desire. Setting down the boy, Silo remarked to the friends who had beheld the scene, how well it was for them that the little hero was still so young. 27 This boy, stern and fearless beyond his years, was Porcius Cato. His behavior is a strong instance of the Roman determination...
