At that time there was practically no literature on this subject. The different systems, the methods in vogue in various sections of the country were little known and less understood outside of their own locality. Information was gathered largely by word of mouth and the general knowledge, even among officers and directors, was limited. Systems and practices grew up seemingly indigenous to the community where they originated. Customs of varying merit, once established, were adhered to with a tenacity and local pride that was commendable for its honesty of purpose, but which did not always reflect credit on the wisdom of those responsible. There was a dearth of practical, reliable information and a consequent divergence of practices and methods. Today it is not an exaggeration to say that a transformation has taken place. The literature on the subject has grown to voluminous proportions. In this respect, as in many others, the leagues - national, state and local - have been a great incentive.
