Many fish are so transparent that it is quite easy to make out the much-coiled intestine, and above it the silvery air bladder, which helps to keep it afloat. Method: Lead the children to observe the breathing, eating, and motion of the fish by watching and feeding the animals before and after school. Give each child a piece of paper and tell her to write a sentence, telling the number of fins which the gold fish has. Invariably they say five. Give to each a hektograph drawing telling them that they may reconsider their answer. Send to the aquarium those who do not yet see that with the two pairs of paired fins there are altogether seven fins. Teach them the names of the fins. Give them, a few at a time,...
